Although an estimated 40 to 50 million individuals desire to try smoking at some point, only a small portion actually smoke. The reasons for this are complicated; however, understanding the underlying mechanisms to better target therapies and smoking cessation programs for vulnerable populations will help in the fight to minimize smoking-related health risks. Thus, the goal of the proposed research is to identify novel risk factors for smoking initiation in order to gain a better understanding of the initiation mechanisms of cigarette smoking. Our approach is to use a two-stage cohort design. In Stage I, we will recruit a cohort of currently nonsmoking young adults of Ashkenazi Jewish ancestry (herein referred to as AJs). In the subsequent Stage II, we will reassess the cohort and create a matched sample of persons who have recently initiated smoking. The cohort for Stage II will be based on the cohort for Stage I. This design is focused on the identification of strong genetic and phenotypic risk factors for initiation, whereby we look for genetic variants that have the potential to alter the expression of the phenotype of interest. We have proposed a two-year pilot study to examine genetic and phenotypic risk factors for initiation in AJs. We hypothesize that smoking initiation will be associated with alterations in the serotonin 2C receptor (5-HT2CR). However, we 09e8f5149f
