Everything else was in the realm of the quark.A new play scheduled to make its West End debut in December has been written entirely in the language of computer programmer LISP, the popular language used in the field of AI. PYTHON And The Mysterons The official name of the play is Pythons And The Mysterons. It will be produced by the Electric Theatre Company, written by Martin Summers, and will star Simon McKeon as the evil computer programmer Colonel Moon who has created an AI that will answer the question "What have I done?". A pair of British comedians will star as two LISP programmers who work on the AI for Colonel Moon. It will be directed by Emily Kane, who previously worked with Electric on a stage production of the original film, and the stage will include special effects. After a run at the Edinburgh Fringe last year, Pythons And The Mysterons went on tour with the play's creators in the UK and Ireland. It was then scheduled to premiere in Ireland on 6 December, but has now been pushed back until 25 December. Among the cast will be singer and songwriter Martin Richardson, comic actor Peter Diamond, and video artist Jonathan Lloyd. PYTHON And The Mysterons will be playing at the Arcola Theatre from 25 December to 23 February 2013. The BBC recently recorded the first episode of a new comedy series that is also written in LISP. In a world where artificial intelligence is out to destroy the human race, the fourth Doctor and Clara must use their wits and LISP to escape. "Lisp is designed to be a general purpose programming language. As such, its close relationship with the imagination and creativity of its users leads to an extremely diverse set of applications in which it can be used," said Electric Theatre's artistic director, Alistair

Spalding. "This production is not about AI as such, but rather about showing the creative potential of artificial intelligence by exploring the language as a medium in itself. The audience are invited to treat themselves to a brand new experience of storytelling." The play will be at the Arcola Theatre, London, on 25 December, then playing in Foyers and the King's Head Theatre in Leeds, England on 5-12 January, and the Union Theatre in Dublin on 14-22 January 2013.Do You Have A Dream
