The present invention relates to a method for controlling the flow of a blast of cleaned gas through the self-cleaning apparatus of a coal pulverizer in order to produce and supply a self-cleaning blast of cleaned gas to the atmosphere as a self-cleaning blast. The apparatus of the present invention allows for a selective flow or shut down of the self-cleaning blast to allow the apparatus to operate normally and in the event of such shut down of the self-cleaning apparatus it is capable of compensating for flow of only a slight portion of the blast of cleaned gas to the atmosphere by the self-cleaning device. The self-cleaning apparatus of the present invention functions to clean the apparatus by the well known methods of hot air or hot blast and if the flow of hot gas is too high as to detrimentally affect the environment surrounding the self-cleaning apparatus there is an air or gas flow shut off device associated with the self-cleaning apparatus which shuts off the flow of the hot gas. A self-cleaning apparatus of the present invention has generally been known in the art. However, known self-cleaning apparatus have not been designed to compensate for the effect of a proportionately low flow of the blast of cleaned gas to the atmosphere caused by a shut down of the
