Theresa May is standing down as party leader and prime minister. Boris Johnson remains as foreign secretary. The third MP from Northern Ireland, Sammy Wilson – whose constituency lies a few miles from the Irish border – is the only Conservative MP who crossed the floor to join the opposition in the last parliament. A week ago he said that May was failing to reach out to the "forgotten" and "persecuted". But on the night he voted with his party. For Labour, Yvette Cooper is the only person to have crossed the floor since 2010, when she became the party's MP for Normanton, Pontefract and Castleford. She was one of those who campaigned hardest for a second referendum. Now, she says that the election result "seriously" weakens the case for another vote. She has a stark choice. She can sit in the opposition – where she is the official chair of a motion calling for a Brexit extension – or she can try to become an MP again. There are currently 11 men and one woman among the 25-strong Corbyn-backing shadow cabinet. As such, the party has returned fewer women than any other major Westminster party: last May the Tories had 44. It is a notable omission for an opposition that claims to be centred on women. "The electoral map tells me that it is difficult to see how Labour can make up the ground in England if it isn't prepared to include more women candidates. An opposition that simply consists of men isn't going to cut it," says Nicola Blackwood, the shadow health secretary. In 2018, Labour lost by a record margin of 51.8% to 48.2%. The Conservatives won their biggest parliamentary majority in over 80 years. Labour's vote share dropped from 45.1% to 39.6%, with their share of the vote falling from 40.4% to 36.9%. Those figures suggest that Labour lost more supporters than the Conservatives picked up. But in seats where Labour held on
