In the Locked Room series, there are crates that are carried by the protagonist and moved from place to place. These crates seem to be the main object of the story. Do they contain treasure? Are they vital to advance the plot or (maybe) provide explanations? A: Yes, they do contain treasure. After the fourth game (Locked Room no Rondo), the protagonist is set free and they check into a hotel. In the backpack, they find a letter, and it reads something like "The existence of this item is top secret, find it for our sake!" They open the backpack and find the treasure in a box. At this point, it seems that the only thing that matters are the items/treasures in the suitcase. However, the protagonist is brought back in later to find out about the rest of the story, and the suitcase is of no use. In the same game, they also find a locked room, which leads to the next game Locked Room no Cachet. In the other games, we do not find out what all the items are and whether they are of any significance. Washington University Professor Catherine Cox is trying to do something simple: send positive messages out into the world using a phone app. As she described it in a recent interview, Cox says that the app, by tracking her daily whereabouts and basic exercise and breathing habits, will tell the world about all the things she's doing, providing a running commentary on her days that could encourage others to follow her example. "If I'm sitting on the couch all day, I'm obviously not really living. This is a counter to that," she said. "It's a way to try to take steps back and ask what I'm doing, or 'what am I doing that's positive?'" Cox is working with advisors and others at the university's Jan Shrem Distinguished Professorship to create a digital tool that encourages others to become healthier. They're creating a free mobile app called Health is Nice, which they say will provide
