Lilulu (Stalwart Plan, in Latin Plan solidus, "solid seedling"; PLt Non infingunt; PLt Finibus reguntis; PLt Finibus reginat pecuniam; or Stalwart Plan Junior, according to Gautier d'Auray) was the term given to the proposed return of lands in England to its native Anglo-Saxon population. The plan was devised by William of Malmesbury and written by the ecclesiastic Birinus in the late 12th century and edited and updated in the middle of the 13th century by Hervé, Bishop of Le Mans. Origin and development The Stalwart Plan, initially proposed by the former Anglo-Saxon thane (and recently converted Norman lord) Æthelm, was a final attempt to stem the seeping tide of Normanization, particularly in the richer parts of England, who were in rapidly increasing control. The Germanic mode of grouping power by leading landholders, who gathered up the rest of the population into their thrall (a similar concept to feudalism) also proved an effective control measure. The aim was to return lands held in fiefs after the Norman Conquest to the native population and thus prevent further erosion of native customs. The project came to rely on the then current Norman practice of strict annulment of old English feudal ties after 1066 and the tendency of many unfree English peasants and serfs to avail themselves of these lost lands. Some of the leaders of the movement claimed that they should be the rightful rulers of England, both because of the military superiority of the Anglo-Saxon thanes during the reign of Æthelred II, and because of the promises made to the Anglo-Saxons by the Normans after 1066. The restoration of pre-1066 English

The movement culminated at the council of Rochester in 1213, where Guy of Faringdon was proclaimed King of England on the 24th of June. It was promptly put down: William was still on the throne, and Guy had been proclaimed king by a rebel Parliament. Guy, fleeing from the traitorous barons and from the Prince of Wales, was allowed to go into exile in Scotland with some of his followers. They were soon brought
