Financial advisors say people should begin preparing now for what's ahead. They told CNBC, it may take years for the country's economy to fully recover. "It's moving way too fast for people to get their house in order," says Robert Kocher, president of The Henneman Group. "We're already seeing some problems." Many of those problems will be seen by consumers in the form of higher taxes and debt. For example, people with a household income of $250,000 and above will face tax increases of 4.6 percent on their income, while those with an income of less than $200,000 will see their taxes increase by 2.9 percent. In addition, people with debt will feel the pinch, too. Student debt hit an all-time high in 2013, and now has surpassed $1 trillion. And it looks like consumers won't be able to escape from all of their bills. Most of the measures taken by the Obama administration in his final year in office is aimed at dealing with the deficit. "It's not necessarily what [President Obama] will be remembered for, it's the way he is leaving," says Marnie Eisenstadt of Decision Point. "From the standpoint of his fiscal accomplishments, it's been an awful legacy." Obama's policies could cause consumer confidence to plunge and further harm the American economy, says Rich Yamarone of the American Economic Council. According to the Council's new survey of economists, the economy is going to lag in 2014, which could lead to a so-called double-dip recession. "The cliche is that if the U.S. goes over the 'fiscal cliff,' it's going to be like a second New Year's Eve for the American economy, like a gunshot wound," Yamarone says. Economists are predicting that the economy is going to not only slip into a recession in 2014.
