The approach allows researchers to simulate the flow of negative and positive ions in terms of gas molecules. Their findings were published in the journal Scientific Reports. The behaviour of ions is known to play a crucial role in the formation of electrical and magnetic fields within the body. The ionisation currents induced by the behaviour of ions are responsible for these fields, including those generated by nerve and muscle activity. In the field of magnetic resonance imaging, the interaction of charged ions, such as those generated by water, with the magnetic field of a powerful magnet is used to differentiate soft tissue and achieve high-contrast images. For these and other scientific purposes, highly specific, well-controlled and fastpulsed ion sources are required. At the moment, such sources are either based on vacuum techniques or on bulky devices. However, high-speed ion beam generation in solvents (e.g., liquids) is a task requiring a fundamental breakthrough in the field of ion science. To this end, scientists at the MPI für Festkörperforschung in Stuttgart have developed an innovative approach to control the movement of ions in liquids. Based on the facile exchange of single ions of one type (singly charged) with ions of the other type (multiply charged) with simultaneous illumination of the solution by two light sources, the team has produced a solvated ion source that removes ions of a specific charge. 648931e174
