The content of this chapter is only available to participants in the IEA Massachusetts/New England Chapter The following is an excerpt from the book "Global Energy and Climate Outlook to 2025", which is available for download here. In response to this threat, policymakers are now calling for far reaching reductions in fossil fuel-based electricity and heat production. Even less obvious, however, it is now clearly necessary. [...] Earlier in this book, I noted that wind and solar electricity and heating account for 15% of the total global electric and heat demand. The consistent long-term growth and progress of these two categories of renewable energy is clear. Yet, like other modes of generation, they need energy supply infrastructure to both operate and expand. In other words, the substantial investment in energy supply infrastructure required for renewable energy is too often resisted by local communities, regional governments, and national governments, which view it as an unnecessary or excessive cost on their citizens, their local economies, and the national economy. [... ] At the same time, the relentless growth of global population and consumption will not slow significantly. Fossil fuel demand cannot be decoupled from the development and expansion of the global economy, the transfer and diffusion of technology, the extension of the life expectancy of the population, and the spread of information and education, whether these are based on old techniques or new. Given this reality, long-term technological innovation is necessary to help stabilize the growth of global energy demand in a sustainable way. The last three decades have seen dramatic changes in energy technology, especially in the area of energy efficiency, s
