Phenylephrine and dipropylacetate effects on the threshold of tinnitus in man. In previous studies using the auditory-nerve preparation in guinea pigs it has been shown that phenylephrine (0.1-1 microM) and dipropylacetate (0.1-1 mM) significantly decreased the tinnitus threshold of the cochlea. This decrease resulted from an attenuation of the masking effect of the tinnitus-producing noise. In the present study the effects of these two substances were investigated using the tonal stimulus in man. The dipropylacetate effect was slightly present in the female population, but no reliable effect was found with phenylephrine. β decay where the energy of the recoiling nucleus is also seen as the initial state of the α decay.
