This is the Reizwagen, a camper van with an internal combustion engine, a manual gearbox, seating, and windows. Looking at the bottom of the dash, I saw large vacuum tubes, and a number of germanic words I didn't recognize. As I continued to do more research I came across something called "PIUS". It is quite common in Germany for old people to hire out their homes/vans as sleeping houses. The PIUS office claims 40,000 German occupants in their own vans. I recently became aware of a 15th century English religious movement called "Quakers". These Quakers also shared a similar religious belief system that they called the "Friend of God", who was another name for Christ. When I found this out I was intrigued to learn that the Germanic word for "Friend of God" is also "PIUS". Does this mean that PIUS is a legacy of the Quakers and that the Germans developed a cultural movement around the same belief systems that the English and the Germans had worked together
