MIAMI -- David Beckham made a bold proclamation before the start of the Spanish Super Cup on Thursday: The Los Angeles Galaxy will be a factor in Major League Soccer, even without Landon Donovan. Donovan, of course, has been the longtime face of the league. He was traded Monday from the club he's represented for more than a decade. But Beckham, who recently signed a seven-year, $38-million deal with the Galaxy, expressed confidence that Donovan's departure will allow other players to step into a role to make big impacts in MLS. "The league has really come from here, from L.A.," Beckham said. "It's the best team in the league now. So to try and detach yourself from that is difficult. "When Landon left, a lot of people think, 'OK, well, maybe they're not going to be the team that they were when they had Landon playing there.' Well, they still are a fantastic team. But I think people do take it from L.A. as the standard." Donovan's announcement, first announced by the Galaxy, came as a bit of a surprise to many. Donovan, 34, in his 15th and final season with the Galaxy, had been expected to announce he was returning to the United States last summer but struggled to make a decision. That led to a trial with English Premier League club Aston Villa, but the former national soccer player of the year last month called it off with Villa to return to MLS. When he arrived in Spain for this week's Super Cup match against Real Madrid,
