This invention relates to the installation of tubular members, such as studs, into a hollow wall, such as a wall comprising a concrete slab, in a dry environment. More particularly, this invention relates to the use of a tubular member, such as a stud, for the installation of a door or similar structure within a hollow wall, such as a concrete wall, in a dry environment. In the construction industry, it is desirable to use metallic tubular members, such as studs, for the installation of tubular members, such as doors and sliding glass structures. Particularly, it is desirable to use studs for the installation of such doors and sliding glass structures, because the installation of such tubular members in place of wood provides a finished door or window which is of a non-wood type. Unfortunately, most metallic members, such as studs, are susceptible to corrosion. Indeed, corrosion problems are often so severe that the use of a metallic tubular member for the installation of a door within a hollow wall is impractical. In particular, corroded studs may be unusable for installation of a door or other structure within a hollow wall. A corroded metallic tubular member may, for example, be too large or too small to receive a door or other structure, even if it is enlarged to receive the door. Alternatively, a corroded metallic tubular member may be too small to receive a door or other structure, and, even if enlarged to receive the door or other structure, may be too small to allow for the precise construction of the door or other structure. It would be desirable to eliminate, or at least minimize, the

Another problem arises when a hollow wall or concrete slab to be installed with a metallic tubular member has a hole or other irregularities in the hollow wall or concrete slab, and when it is desirable to install the metallic tubular member into the wall or concrete slab to be installed through the hole or other irregularities. For example, a hollow wall or concrete slab has a hole or other irregularities. A conventional tubular member is capable of passing through these holes or irregularities. However, these holes or irregularities are usually much too small to allow the installation of the tubular member through the hole or irregularity. It would be desirable to be able to install a metallic tubular member, such as a stud, through
