In the central nervous system, molecules that bind 5-HT and DA have been found to exist as heterodimers. Furthermore, many of the behavioural actions of psychopharmacological drugs like the antidepressants are dependent on their interactions with such 5-HT and DA heterodimers. It has been suggested that the heterodimers may form by a process of gene-gene interaction. The dimerization of 5-HT1B and 5-HT1C receptors and DA receptors of the D1, D2 and D3 subtypes can be predicted on the basis of their pharmacological and molecular properties and they appear to constitute a new class of G protein-coupled receptors. Recently it has been shown that heterodimers of the DA D1 and DA D2 subtypes form in a similar way, and that a gene encoded by a 5-HT receptor may participate in the regulation of the expression of a 5-HT receptor gene, which in turn could act as a feedback signal to the original gene. It is predicted that there will be more and more evidence on the existence of this multiple gene-gene interaction. Most importantly, one should not be too quick to accept the "monoamine hypothesis" for the mechanisms of action of antidepressant drugs.Q: How to get rid of the 'Filtered HTML' warning (W3C) I have found and followed a couple of the tips on How to get rid of "Filtered HTML" warning and others that mention the W3C Validator. The trick I have been using is to add an output element outside the form and hide the form using display: none;. I then add a script that outputs an image. The problem is that this does not work for all websites. For example I get the same warning with At the moment I would have to look at each site for this and style the form accordingly. Is there a way to get rid of the warnings with a general solution? A: For at least chrome and firefox, if a website is not validating against Occ13bf012
