Hydrothermal pretreatment of the lignocellulosic fraction of hybrid poplar for bioethanol production. Hydrothermal pretreatment was used to study its influence on the bioethanol production ability of the lignocellulosic fraction of hybrid poplar. The results show that pretreatment at 170 degrees C for 10, 15, or 20 min has similar effects on improving the acetyl content of cellulose, but 90 min is not enough to remove the side effects, and the residues are recalcitrant to the enzymatic hydrolysis. Furthermore, to make the enzymatic hydrolysis process simple, the addition of pretreated liquor to the system is a simple method and can promote the hydrolysis rate of cellulose and hemicellulose, as well as the production of glucose and xylose from the solid residues after enzymatic hydrolysis. The combination of hydrothermal pretreatment with enzymatic hydrolysis requires an additional pretreatment step to improve the overall production of bioethanol from hybrid poplar
