I was reading this article about a new biography of Napoleon I by a current British Consul to France, but I couldn't find a reference when the first meeting between Napoleon and Wellington took place. Napoleon's relative inexperience of battlefields added to his lack of personal discipline meant that he made little of the battles he fought. In the early part of the Peninsular War Napoleon, having refused to consider the possibility of a defensive campaign, launched an expedition to the Iberian Peninsula. He had not envisaged that the French would have to fight a major campaign against the British who would be reinforced by military blockades. It seems that he was a beginner. The best French commanders didn't do well in the mid-eighties and Napoleon's time in the Alps did not help either. I can't find any other references on the first meeting between the two. Can you help? A: There are no sources in which to date his first contact with Wellington. None. Wikipedia mentions it though with a lot of exaggeration. According to one source, his first encounter with Wellington, the British commander who would become his most enduring opponent in the Peninsula, took place in June 1809, during Napoleon's campaign against Austria. Napoleon won some victories against Austrians in 1809, but the story states: At that time, Wellington was serving in a subordinate role. But he was the first to recognise the power of Napoleon. The whole story is written in these terms. Something similar applies to the Wikipedia page about this meeting. Then there are at least three events mentioned where Napoleon had contacts with the British The first one is the battle of Wagram on 3 July 1809 where Napoleon tried to avoid battle by offering to hold his retreat, when Wellington had to attack from the flank. Napoleon was quick to use the excuse that he was at the

Though the telehealth industry is still in its relative infancy, it's anticipated to grow into one of the country's fastest-growing industries by 2030, according to a new report out of the University of Minnesota's Center for Healthcare Value. More than half of those currently working for a private-sector employer could be employed in a health-related profession by 2030, including pharmacists, nurses, physicians, and "health informaticists," says the report. Medicine is projected to remain the most common career path for future healthcare
