Stress-responsive tryptophan-containing peptide (SRTP) is a bioactive regulatory peptide first isolated from myocardium, and exhibits protective effects in various organs under stress, inflammation and pathological insults. The purpose of the current study was to investigate the protective effect of SRTP on rat pancreas under ischemia/reperfusion (IR) injury and the possible mechanism. Rats underwent right common carotid artery ligation followed by reperfusions for 0, 1, 3, 6, 9 and 12 h. SRTP (2.0 mg kg(-1), i.v.) was injected 30 min prior to reperfusion. The results showed that pretreatment with SRTP significantly decreased the serum levels of amylase and lipase in IR rats, and improved histology and ultrastructure of the pancreas. In addition, SRTP pretreatment resulted in the inhibition of apoptosis and the acceleration of autophagy in the pancreas of IR rats. Additionally, the anti-inflammatory effect of SRTP was evidenced by the decreased by the decreased by the decreased by the decreased of the time interleukin-1β levels in serum. The results suggest that SRTP exerts protective effects on the ischemic injury of the pancreas and may be developed as a new therapeutic agent against IR-related diseases.
