Hybrid organic/inorganic semiconducting materials with tunable electronic properties are of great interest for many applications. For example, the use of the combination of polymer and fullerene molecules for organic light-emitting devices and solar cells is of particular importance because of the additional capabilities they give to the materials for photovoltaic and photocatalytic energy conversion. For practical applications, the details of charge transfer and photoinduced processes in the interface of these materials must be understood in order ca3bfb1094
