Choosing the right software for your needs Adobe Photoshop is the classic, premium photo editing tool. It is used to edit photographs, create effects, and retouch images. Photoshop is capable of a wide range of different editing tasks. However, it is primarily designed for working with photographs and not so much with graphics. If you need to work with graphics, you might want to try Adobe Photoshop Elements. A key reason for choosing Photoshop is that it is capable of very complex image editing. Adobe Photoshop currently has more features than any other comparable software and it's also packed with additional features that you might want. Photoshop has lots of features and it's likely that there's at least one feature you'll find useful. Nevertheless, Adobe Photoshop Elements has a lighter version of Photoshop's features but with the same look and feel. The image editor you choose will depend on your needs. Will you be editing photographs? Do you mainly need to edit graphics? Do you just want to edit photos that you've downloaded from the Internet, or do you also want to edit your own photos? For example, if you edit a photo that you have purchased from a photo shop, you might not have any need to have Photoshop Elements. However, if you're looking to edit a photo from the Internet, or you have your own collection of photos, you need to make sure that the photo editing tool you use has a good editing interface. Photoshop's interface is very suitable for photo editing, but it can be a little confusing for beginners. How can you tell if Photoshop Elements is right for you? Try using the software for a while to see if there are any features that are useful to you. Alternatively, you can read the feature comparison tables below to get a quick idea of what the different software offers. A note about Photoshop Elements 6 Photoshop Elements 6 was launched in 2008. At the time of writing, the version is available as a standalone program or as part of a bundle with the updated version of Photoshop Elements 12. Share In what is described as the first large-scale study of the impact of local food systems in the U.S., a new paper in the journal Environmental Health Perspectives found that, in addition to environmental and health benefits, the local food economy can support jobs, boost the local economy and contribute to local economic development. Those were among the conclusions of a cross-sectional survey of 311 grocery stores in the U.S. conducted by the University of Michigan. "This study is the most thorough analysis of the local food movement and its impact on local food systems and economies that has been done to date," said lead author Patrick Kumiega, who was a post-doctoral fellow at Michigan when the study was conducted. "We found that in addition to environmental and health benefits, the local food economy supports jobs, boost the local economy and contributes to regional economic development." One of the key findings of the study is that the share of food dollars spent on locally produced items was greater in rural communities and suburban areas than in metropolitan areas. But the authors found no differences in per capita spending among community sizes. The paper also found that grocery stores in wealthier communities were more likely to stock local food than in poorer communities. It also found, however, that an additional 16 percent of the stores surveyed stocked organic food in the past year. "The vast majority of people that shop at the small town grocery store are doing so for the same basic thing: they want healthy food. And those that do, tend to be concerned with the impact that manufactured products have on our health. And we think that's a big part of what's driving their decision to do their shopping locally," Kumiega told Midwest Dairy News. "We found in the study that it's not only the economic case for the local food system that is important, but also the health benefits." According to the study, 87 percent of the respondents reported that they bought local food for health reasons. This includes those who purchase local food for environmental and other reasons and those who were primarily seeking out local food. "We also found that small independent grocery stores were more likely to spend more of their food dollars on locally produced food than larger grocery chains, even though the latter tend to have greater shares of their stores devoted to locally produced food," Kumiega said. "We think that the desire for increased
