FYI. --Stinson 16 months. In the present case report, we successfully treated the patient with a conservative approach. We did not take off any screws during the treatment. We just considered the potential infection and bone loss after the initial soft tissue injury from an open fracture. We would not have exposed the soft tissue again. Our plan was to achieve union with bone graft and plate. Therefore, we did not insert the screws back to achieve early weight bearing. We added bone graft about 15 months after the surgery. The infection was completely cured at 6 months, but the patient did not gain any weight for the following 2 years. The other problems related to bone loss that did not necessarily need to be fixed with fixed appliances or surgery were allowed to take time to heal and we planned to fix them later. In that time, we just treated the soft tissue injury and weight bearing and needed to take care of the screws of the external fixator at the end. The patient did not present with any other complication. He was satisfied with the treatment outcome and has been doing regular follow-up for the past 7 years. He has shown no symptoms of infection or recurrence. Because of the absence of pseudoarthrosis in this case, we consider that both the condition of the fracture and the preoperative treatment were good. From a biomechanical point of view, the load transfer to the osteotomy site is established through the bones in the proximal tibia and through the plate and screws in the distal part. The length of the osteotomy is also important for the bone healing. The width of the osteotomy line has an effect on the amount of stress placed on
