An apparatus of the above-outlined kind is known from European patent application No. 00 56 742. The apparatus described in the above-identified publication comprises a looper unit with a generally triangular endless looper chain formed of individual links each provided with a receptacle to receive a fastener segment and a reciprocating drive motor for driving the looper chain in a back and forth manner. The looper chain is stationarily placed in front of a piecing device in which the individual fastener segments are pieced together by being pushed into the receptacles of the looper chain. The looper chain transports the fastener segments into the piecing device from the feeder. The feeder has a supply of fasteners consisting of connected series of individual fasteners and adapted to be detachably connected to a needle, so that the individual fasteners of the series can be fed to the feeder and subsequently from it onto the looper chain. The feeding of the individual fasteners from the feeder into the looper chain is brought about by means of two elements which engage into the fasteners from the side and transfer them from the feeder into the looper chain. These elements contact the upper surface of the fastener during the feed of the fasteners and cause the individual fasteners to be stripped from the fastener string. Stripping elements are used in pairs, so that each of the individual fasteners is fed via the stripping elements to the conveyor from where the individual fasteners are further transported to the piecing device, where they are deposited in the looper chain and are subsequently pulled by a conveyor belt into the piecing device. A drawback of the apparatus just described is its unsatisfactory operating reliability, since the feeder can never be fully closed, as the looper chain necessarily moves into the feeder during the stripping of the fasteners, i.e. the looper chain passes through the feeding chambers
