It is named after the Spanish naturalist Ildefonso Cerda de Bonafacio. The first recorded observation was by a member of a naval expedition, who spotted the dolphin on January 25, 1876, in an area of the Mediterranean Sea known to then as Balearic Sea. Interest in the species was not revived until two more sightings were reported off the coast of North Africa in May 1907, and November 1910, respectively. In July 1911, a female dolphin was observed by a local fisherman in the Bay of Saint-Florent off the coast of Corsica, thus establishing an annual migratory pattern for the species. Risso's Dolphin is also known as a late-surviving marine endemic. Life History and Behavior Risso's Dolphin is an extremely shy and reclusive animal, and none are believed to reside in the wild. The species is tolerant of being captured and studied, however, for reasons such as their diminutive size and lack of predators. Although this dolphin has never bred in captivity, it has been observed feeding on plankton and schooling. Most of the known observations of the Risso's Dolphin occurred between the years 1907 and 1914. During this time period, the Risso's Dolphin would migrate from its breeding grounds off the coast of Africa to the lagoons and coastal waters of Corsica every winter. It is estimated that this dolphin 1cdb36666d
