Hurricane Irma and Maria caused significant physical and economic damage to the Caribbean. This study assessed healthcare use in Puerto Rico and the US/USVI for the period September 2017 to March 2018 (following Hurricane Irma) and January 2018 to August 2018 (following Hurricane Maria). Data from Puerto Rico were obtained from the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) and the US/USVI through the CMS/Office of the National Coordinator for Health Information Technology. Rates of hospitalization, outpatient, and emergency department (ED) visits were compared to baseline trends for the prior 18 months. Data from Puerto Rico indicate that total inpatient hospitalizations increased 13.7% during September 2017 to August 2018 compared to the preceding 18 months and increased 11.1% between September 2017 to March 2018 and the preceding 18 months, while ED visits increased 14.5% during the same time period. Data from the US/USVI indicate that hospitalization and ED utilization decreased significantly, but outpatient visits increased 10.0%. Differences in hospitalization and ED use between both data sources may be explained by lack of consistent reporting during the time period examined, or reporting issues related to US/USVI territories. Healthcare utilization following hurricanes Irma and Maria in Puerto Rico and the US/USVI appears to be significantly impacted compared to the prior 18 months. The present study reports on the effects of intracerebroventricular (ICV) infusion of insulin-like growth factor-I (IGF-I) on the concentration of IGF-I in the forebrain of young rats. The microdialysis technique was used to localize the site of IGF-I action. Concentration of IGF-I was estimated in the forebrain by ICV infusion of IGF-I into 30 microl of perfusate. A microdialysis probe was stereotactically implanted into the nucleus tractus solitarius (NTS) of rats aged 5 weeks, and infused with recombinant human IGF-I at a rate of 0.25 microg/h for 60 min. Concentration of IGF-I in the brain was significantly
