The first reaction to it is 'Wow..'.Sibilant sound production in neonates with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction. In a selected group of children with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction, sibilant sounds were elicited, and the pattern of sound production was compared with that of the normal speech-language sample. An increase in the number of partial consonants and a rise in the percentage of consonants produced in an unvoiced fashion was noted in the speech sample of children with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction. Analysis of the sibilant sounds of these speech-language samples showed a higher incidence of voiced fricative and stop consonants in the speech sample of children with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction, whereas in the group of children with normal speech sample, the sibilant sounds had lower values. In contrast, lower values of /s/ and /p/ in unvoiced sounds and lower values of /s/ in voiced fricatives were found in the group with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction. The temporal changes found in phonetic features of the sibilant sounds of the speech sample of children with cleft palate and velopharyngeal dysfunction suggest that the amount of oral airway contact and the degree of velopharyngeal insufficiency are important factors in establishing the consonantal features of the speech sample.
