I know there are recommendations on how to do this for stateless (e.g., GET), but for a form that has a CSRF token inside the form, should I send the CSRF token in the refresh, or in the POST form that comes back from the server? The form that shows up on the client side for refreshing is the same form that usually comes back for POSTing. So is this a valid approach? A: A common approach would be to send the CSRF token with the refresh. If something goes wrong then the user will get an error in their browser. If something goes right they will see the same page, but with a new session ID (provided that the session ID is sent in the refresh). If it's important for you that the user sees the exact same page, then you can have the server detect if the session id is changing and redisplay the page with the new session ID. [Stress and the voice]. Voice is the result of the interaction between the laryngeal structures and the swallowing act. Since voice is the expression of the patient, it can be altered by any kind of disease. In the otorhinolaryngologist, voice is perceived as a diagnostic and therapeutic tool and therefore, must be known and valued by the various disciplines that are involved in its study (audiological and morphological assessment, voice surgery, speech therapy and phoniatic medicine). In the otorhinolaryngological department, the clinical assessment is essential to evaluate the patient and to plan the correct treatment, although it is an indirect evaluation.

However, in the past, 'poverty reduction' has been an integral component of climate mitigation policies. Such policies have tended to emphasize energy efficiency and conservation measures that have lessened the dependence of poor households on electricity, and made reliance on other energy sources less intensive. It is now suggested that new policies and programmes will have to be adopted if the poor are to be protected and poverty alleviated in the face of increased energy use and a growing dependence on oil, and the associated increase in CO2 emissions. In most countries, there is a real risk that chronic hunger and poverty in the years to come will be intensified by the rising cost of imported fuels. This may also adversely affect the influence of environmental information campaigns, which have tended to focus on the role of greenhouse gas emissions as a cause of climate change. The problem is most acute in the driest regions of the continent where energy and water shortages combined with climatic conditions are likely to increase the vulnerability of many people. These areas of Africa are especially sensitive to climatic changes and/or increases in the cost of imported energy, which in the short term will tend to aggravate poverty and hunger. Of the African
