luminescens Tt.I, an enterobacterium, produces an exotoxin which kills diverse host organisms (e.g. M. luteus) and binds to nucleic acids. This virulence factor, termed Tt.I or a 12 kilodalton protein, is an alkyl hydroperoxide reductase.
This enzyme is also produced by Pseudomonas aeruginosa and Salmonella typhimurium; however, in these organisms it is not an outer membrane protein. We propose to examine the possibility that there is a family of peroxide reductases, with the members being coded for by genes with homology to a single gene in P. aeruginosa. The objective of this project is to determine how the P. luminescens Tt.I is synthesized, secreted, and delivered to the outer membrane in the cytoplasmic membrane, as well as to study the molecular mechanism by which this protein is transported. We shall determine whether the Tt.I is cotranslationally or posttranslationally targeted to the periplasm. If this targeting is mediated by an amino-terminal presequence, it will be utilized to investigate the role of membrane-bound ribosomes in protein targeting. We shall also investigate the periplasmic proteins which recognize and bind to the Tt.I. The Tt.I is present in only a small percentage of P. luminescens cells. To understand better the mechanism of excretion and delivery of this protein, we shall attempt to isolate mutants which are not excreted. If this is successful, we will attempt to characterize the function of the gene. To date, none of the evidence indicates that this gene is essential to P. luminescens or its ability to replicate.

However, functional replacement may be possible.

We propose to develop replacement vectors, and attempt to complement the mutant with cloned genes. We shall also attempt to disrupt the resident gene in order to produce more defined mutants. In addition, we shall seek to develop an in vitro host (a bacteriophage) which infects this and other strains of P. luminescens. This system will be useful in identifying genes
