House of Umkhonto, a collective of South African women, yesterday released a number of statements in support of women in the workplace and their right to work with equal pay. However, a close look at the statements reveals that the Collective have not paid equal attention to the nature of the exploitation, especially slavery, that women face in the workplace. If the Collective truly supported women, they would clearly state and act on the fact that the exploiters of women workers include all those under the pretext of being providers, i.e. all men. “We write to you as a group of women who are active in our trade unions and in movements for social change and who are committed to building equitable and just work relations at all levels,” begins the Collective. “There is a persistent myth that the ANC/government is working to improve work conditions for women.” The Collective should have included the long-standing fact that the ANC has consistently not acted in support of the interests of women workers and that the issue of women and working conditions is a pet-project of individuals such as the Mozambican First Lady Graça Machel and Airton

Pimenta da Costa. "It is generally believed that a woman's role is to take care of her children and work outside the home. Unfortunately, this is not true. It is not women's role to work for an hour or two in the morning and then spend the rest of the day looking after children. The labour force should include the support, education and activities of children as well as women," continues the Collective. "In South Africa, as in other
