Quinone-based drugs have been used in the treatment of several diseases since the beginning of this century and their clinical use is still growing. Quinone drugs have also found application in the development of new synthetic anticancer drugs; however, this field has been less productive until the last years. One reason for this is the greater knowledge gained regarding the mechanisms that control the activity of quinones towards biological substrates. Recently, we have been investigating some aspects of the structural requirements of quinone substrates in order to understand the mechanisms that facilitate their interaction with biological substrates. Our current approach is to synthesize quinones that are highly reactive, cell-permeable quinones (CPQs) that can induce tumor-selective cytotoxicity. We have tested a series of CPQs in tumor cell lines of various origins and, in general, we have obtained very potent cytotoxic activity. In addition to the structural requirements for CPQ activity, we are also exploring factors
