Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to the field of ergonomic devices. More particularly, the invention relates to the field of adjustable chairs or other seating devices. 2. Related Art In this application the term "chair" is used to refer to chairs, seating devices and similar seating structures. Chairs are used in a wide variety of settings. In some settings, chairs have a rigid construction that is comfortable for the person using it, while in other settings, chairs are comfortable for the person using them and include adjustable features that allow the chair to be used by persons of different sizes and shapes. The lumbar support is typically a pad having an adjustable height and width so that the pad can be placed at different locations on the back of the person sitting in the chair. The adjusting mechanisms for these types of chairs are commonly referred to as “auto-tilt” mechanisms. Many auto-tilt mechanisms are adjustable between two positions. In one position, the auto-tilt mechanism is in its “up” position. In the up position, the lumbar support pad is at an angle that is well-suited for the person sitting in the chair. In another position, the auto-tilt mechanism is in its “down” position. In the down position, the lumbar support pad is flat and may be supported on the floor. In some applications, chairs of this type may be used in combination with a desk that projects into the space between the chair and the lumbar support pad. The desk may be formed as part of the chair. When the lumbar support pad is in the down position, the desk provides a stable supporting surface. Conversely, when the lumbar support pad is in the up position, the desk provides a stable supporting surface. In one example, the desk may be rotatable relative to the chair between the up and down positions. In other types of applications, chairs may be used in combination with a keyboard and a display that is mounted to the side of the chair in an area that is more or less parallel to the desk. The keyboard and the display are oriented in this area so that the keyboard and the display extend through the opening of the desk as the desk is moved from the
