I have a function to get a list from the database and return a 2D array Example: public function getEmployees() { $this->getConnection()->select("SELECT * FROM employees"); $resultSet = $this->getConnection()->fetchAll(); $resultSet = array_map('serialize', $resultSet); return $resultSet; } I have a lot of similar functions and also a lot of long codes. Is there a way to refactor that (for example use Method Call Syntax or other ways)? A: There are few approaches for this refactoring. First, you can use a factory class to hide the implementation from the user: abstract class DatabaseConnection { // These are the public functions (members) used by the concrete classes // So all the concrete classes will be derived from this base class abstract protected function select(string $sql); abstract protected function fetchAll(array $columns); abstract protected function getConnection(); // These functions are the factory methods, these // are used by the concrete classes public function select(string $sql) { // This is where the implementation of the select function // is done $connection = $this->getConnection(); return $connection->select
