researchers have designed a way to heat a building from a distance using a miniature heater. The new approach promises to cut down on energy consumption and in some cases has the potential to completely eliminate the need for heating and cooling a building. The new nanoscale heaters are about the width of a human hair, and researchers have shown that they can be used to convert energy from any kind of energy source to heat, including sunlight. The nanoscale heaters are nontoxic and do not generate any harmful gases. They also operate at lower temperatures than most other technologies and thus are better suited for harnessing energy from sources that produce heat at lower temperatures, such as wind, sunlight, or geothermal heat. These heaters, based on silicon, can be used for heating and cooling buildings. "We put these little things in water, turn up the temperature, and turn on all the heaters at once," said lead researcher Erik Sahuguillo, an assistant professor of civil and environmental engineering at the University of Michigan. "In a building, you'd have multiple locations where you would turn the heaters on, and just like a flashlight beam of sunlight, the energy would go through buildings and get to where you wanted it. There would be a little leakage, but we think we can deal with that." The nanoscale heaters consist of a thin layer of titanium dioxide, a semiconductor. On the surface of the titanium dioxide, there are tiny structures made of gold that are about a micrometer in size, or about one-thousandth the width of a human hair. Using infrared light, these gold structures absorb light energy and emit heat. When placed in water e79caf774b
