I am writing a small site that has a password generator on the registration page, but I am wondering if the random string that I generate is actually the password and that the user is then sent an email with the credentials so the email has a link for the user to click on to reset their password. I am also wondering if the password should be encrypted so that a user cannot view the password. Cheers! A: Having to generate a password means you have failed to design your application. There are a few reasons why this is bad, but the biggest reason is that users will always expect to have "password" stored with their information, and sooner or later they will get it. There are two ways to go about solving this problem: One is to use, for example, a user name/password combination unique for each user (who registers, anyway? You'd have to make the table larger, anyway.) The other way is to store the password in your application. This sounds like the easiest solution, but it's actually the worst way to go about it, for a couple of reasons: To protect the password from the user, you have to store the password somehow, which means you can't store it in the database. All your web service calls will have to implement two-way authentication, which means that you need to look up the user based on email, the only "objective" property you have in your system, and then perform a second authentication (password, or token-based?). This is redundant and slow. You'll need to write code to deal with certain types of attacks, such as guessing an email address by making a list of everyone's email addresses (since you don't store the password anywhere else) and correlating each of those addresses to what password it would result in (thereby allowing you to "brute force" the password). However, you'll need to write that code when you go live, and you'll need
