Crazy Chicken: Heart of Tibet XS (demo)Â .Q: Does this boolean method, that's based on an iterator, violates the M in MVC pattern? I'm implementing a client class for a protocol I'm designing. It has methods to send and receive messages. I'm using an iterator to determine when to stop sending messages, and I'm using a boolean to determine if there's any more messages to send. My confusion comes from the fact that in the model, the M in MVC dictates that it should not contain a loop logic to handle things like that. Yet my class contains a boolean method named messagesAvailable(). However, I have other methods that check that the variables are initialized, that handle Exceptions, etc. So I have to consider this a violation of the "M" in MVC. Is that correct, or am I misunderstanding MVC? Or am I misunderstanding it enough that it's not really MVC? public void send() { if (this.notDone() && this.messagesAvailable()) { .. stuff this.messageCount++; } else { .. stuff this.messageCount = 0; } this.notDone = true; } I have this very same method when the messageCount is zero, I do this: if (this.messagesAvailable()) { this.send(); this.messageCount++; } and if (this.messagesAvailable()) { .. stuff this.send(); this.messageCount++; } in public boolean messagesAvailable() { while (.. loop to determine if there are more messages to be sent..) { if (this.messagesAvailable()) {
