The clinical significance of premature rupture of the fetal membrane (PROM) was reviewed, with particular emphasis on the effect of premature rupture of the membranes on maternal-fetal outcome. Maternal hypoxemia, uterine contractions, use of oxytocin, duration of labor, and Bishop's score were noted for all cases of PROM at the National Taiwan University Hospital. PROM was treated with tocolytic agents and/or oxytocin augmentation when clinical evidence suggested fetal compromise. A total of 10,173 singleton pregnancies with intact membranes were delivered during the study period. Of the 27, only 8 infants (29%) underwent delivery within 24 hours of the PROM diagnosis. Sixteen of the 27 neonates (59%) were born in respiratory distress and 15 (56%) were transferred to the NICU. Four babies (15%) had an Apgar score less than 7 at 1 minute, but all recovered within 1 hour. One infant died of respiratory distress at 31 hours and another was transferred to a local hospital after 34 hours.
