the first reason is the probability of success. you might be thinking, but what if i get caught? well, the second reason is that the larger the database, the less likely you are to get caught. the third reason is that you can spread your resources across many accounts. you can hit multiple targets at once, which means you can keep your operation under the radar of law enforcement. we're going to look at a few databases now. if you are interested in seeing the software that i used to do this, you can check out the instructions at github.com/mattifestation/account-hitman. the databases i will show you contain credentials from apps like last.fm, gmx.com, justdial.com, rockyou.com, yelp.com, zomato.com, gog.com, couchsurfing.com, tripadvisor. although ioi provides better protection, they still make it extremely easy for an attacker to crack the remaining 58% of hashes. using a single compromised database, an attacker is capable of compromising hundreds of online accounts, while a second method would be to use a credential-stealing botnet such as "projectsnoopy" (or any other credential-stealing botnet). now that you know, you can assume that an attacker would be able to compromise hundreds of online accounts from a single database, and you know how to crack the remaining hashes. in the spirit of the open source community, i have made this tool available on the internet, and made it open-source. this means that you can use it for free. please feel free to contribute to the open source community by forking the github repo, submitting a pull request, or just contributing your ideas. it's a fun way to learn a lot about the internet.

as long as you have a consistent hashing algorithm, you can easily make a random "hitman botnet" that allows the attacker to crack the remaining hashes. in fact, my tool can actually make that decision for you. simply specify the number of credmap hashes to crack, the hashing algorithm, and the target you would like to hit. it's as easy as that. if you are a supporter of the series, you'll know that io interactive is working on a hitman 4 for the pc. that's right, the game is being developed on the pc for release on pc, but there is still no timetable for the release. to be honest, most people have already moved on to their next big project, as hitman 2 is already released. however, io interactive is not dropping support for the pc, and according to an interview, they have about 5 years worth of content ready to go. so hitman 4 will be ready in 5 years, if they get to it. and they still have to release hitman 3 for the pc, and that's just as tricky as it sounds. the pc version of hitman 2 is so bad in comparison to the other console versions, that it's hard to imagine what is next. i'm sure the pc version of hitman 3 will be more pleasant to use, but we'll have to wait and see. hitman 4 on pc will have to be pretty special to compete with the console versions. it's one of the games people are most likely to download on the first day of the eula being announced. and if you're wondering, that's the day the hitman eula gets announced, and it is the day the hitman eula gets released. this eula has people terrified, and they should be. for those who are unaware, the eula is basically the legal contract you agree to when you download the game. you can read it here. it is your legal and protection, and the fact that it is hidden in plain site is a huge security breach. and once you've signed the eula, you're legally bound by it, and you can't just quit the game like you could before. so if you do sign the eula and the game has been installed, and you just want to quit, you can't. there is a legal case against io interactive over this, but i'm not going into the details of the lawsuit here. it's far too complex. 5ec8ef588b
