and i think that my last point is to take a moment and appreciate that china, like any country, has something called its foreign policy. and its the goal and the motives of that foreign policy that dictates what the choices it makes among these different options that can be accomplished domestically, and its the options that it chooses that dictate the consequences that come out of that and the interests and values that it has in mind for those options. and so at the end of the day, and i hope we can agree on this, its not about us versus them, its about us as a group of nations coming together to try to solve a problem that all of us are going to have to live with in one fashion or another. but they are not going to be buying those financing tools to shore up the efficiency that they want to build. theyre not going to be doing that themselves. they are going to, rather, the government has an obligation to provide financial support in areas where they have a presence. so if its a british or american company that will be building these plants, or taking out a loan from china, thats a different scenario. sometimes the chinese make the whole thing more complicated than its really worth. so we have to understand that. weve been struggling for a long time to get them to understand that we really do want the other part of the equation to be built in. if you want the numbers to be different, to build coal in china, build coal in some other countries, is that necessarily a bad thing? uh, we cant judge. im happy to answer questions, but just remember, just like them, we cant judge them either. i do think that the coal is a resource of the past. it can be cleanly mined. i do think that the focus of the electric industry is going to be non-fossil fuel sources, so we need to get out of coal, and we need to get out of fossil fuels in general. this should be about moving to renewables as opposed to building more coal, and i think its important to have access to coal that is in the west. this is a west coast power plant. we are going to grow our business. and i think that the nations of the west, including china, need to understand that as much as we have to get off of coal, they need to get off of fossil fuels.
