

The biggest challenge the Pioneer DDJ-S1 will present to any controller manufacturer is its't the first in the series. There are some great additions to their CDJ-100 line, such as the touchscreen-based 6 channel DJ mixer. The DDJ-S1 brings in a few of those, but less on the control surface side and more on the Technics Turntable side. The DDJ-S1 incorporates USB, Optical, and the new FM radio functions. It looks to be a true beast, and a large one at that. With a functionality heavy approach, it's no wonder that the DDJ-S1 will run up quite the price tag. We're not sure how much Pioneer is going to cost their DDJ-T1/S1 duo, but its looking at $699.99 (they have already launched at a higher amount, but the price is constantly fluctuating). Once the DDJ-S1 comes out, its going to be a question of if you can afford it. The Pioneer DDJ-S1 controller looks to take the already competent layout and make it a near perfect layout for the Serato ITCH platform. This is going to be an easy controller to use because its already been proven easy, but what will be most exciting will be the support from Serato for this controller. Expect to see a wide variety of real-time effects on top of the standard Serato Deck Editor features and a whole slew of add-ons, customizations and effects. And so we have arrived at the end of the curiosity, anticipation and hype-mongering. ### Pioneer Ddj S1 Mapper Virtual Dj

The DDJ-S1 is slated for release in the fall. It will be a controller that works in full compatibility with Serato Scratch and with Traktor Scratch. The only thing that will be missing is the cueing and looping controls that are built into the DDJ-T1. Pioneer will continue to produce a DAP (digital audio player) for Traktor/Sony which will keep the music interface world in one neat box. Pioneer has a few new models in their lineup, one of which is the DDJ-S1, which is a controller that looks like the DDJ-T1, except that it has Scratch controls on the front, just like the S4, but lacks the trackbed and hold button that is on the back of the DDJ-T1. If youre unfamiliar with the original Pioneer DDJ-T1, its essentially a CDJ-2000 with the Technics SA-30 transport ripped out of it, with a 4 channel mixer sound card shoved in. Theyve improved on it quite a bit with the DDJ-S1, which lets it be used with Traktor/Serato/Scratch, and should be a decent alternative to the good quality, but expensive BPM, by fm boombox/digitek line of professional hardware. The first version of the DDJ-S1 released in June of this year and they plan on releasing about 5 models in all. The official website has much more in depth information on the upcoming models. You know what? I dont know anything and it makes me sad! We're in the middle of trying to come up with a list of the best DJ's in history but we have to settle on what software we use. I have used CDJs, Djs, CDJs again, Seratoms, Traktor, Traktor and now it looks like Pioneer will come to us with their own controller. For sure a lot of people have been using Traktor to be in the CDJ-200 family, Serato to be in the S2 family, Apple to be in the MPC-S1000 series and now Pioneer is in the DDJ-S1 family. Music is becoming a very creative mix of hardware and software; even different apps and platforms can find some common ground. While I'm happy to see every DJ using a controller, it would be nice to see a controller that was truly universal. Also, im not big on the concept that the controller is getting in the way when mixing. It is a device to make the mixing easier not harder. Sec8ef588b
