while metallica's live performances are always heavy and intense, they've also evolved to the point that some of the songs they play are as live-sounding as anything they've ever recorded. with the benefit of being able to listen to the band's extended and sometimes live-recorded albums, the band has developed a new knack for mixing and matching their studio recordings with their live renditions in ways that make for some great listening and the occasional eye-opening moment. while master of puppets and ride the lightning are staples of their set lists, they've also been known to play creeping death (on the st. anger tour) or, in the case of the o2 arena, the live version of sad but true. and even when they're not doing a full-blown song, the band will sometimes build their live setlists around a particular instrumental, like "the thing that should not be," from the second ..and justice for all album, which they've done in the past. the band has also recently begun to play their songs during the fifth act of their shows; on august 23rd, they played the opening of "the unforgiven," which is the theme of their upcoming black album tribute tour. handpicked by the world s leading global music festival organizer the day after the band finished recording, james hetfield and lars ulrich were given a choice between two slots on metallica s uk tour. they chose the second leg, which was the last time they played a uk show in the clubs at the astoria, where the band had played some of its earliest shows as members of the band slayer. the band returned to the astoria, where it met its heroes and their fans for the first time on the same bill.
