in some countries, such as in the united states, genetic counseling is implemented in undergraduate medical course as a mandatory subject. usually, the content is similar to the one presented in this paper, but a good number of genetics laboratories are subspecialized in the diagnosis of a selected group of diseases, with great differences in the genetic and clinical data reported in the literature (borrego et al., 2013). the majority of these laboratories have their own databases on the web, which generally include the information provided by the medical genetics services with the goal of providing the patients with their results and help in the management of their medical problem. in some cases, these databases are not controlled by the geneticists or clinical laboratories and their reliability is unknown4444. in order to ensure the quality of the data, some medical genetics societies have developed working groups to promote the standardization of the clinical practice. however, the knowledge of these databases are limited to the geneticists who work in the fields of medical genetics and rarely work in the general population and the general medical practitioners, especially in the primary care clinics and in developing countries. indeed, this scenario is also similar to the service provided by the clinical laboratories, which provides tests for specific diseases and rare diseases. thus, it is clear that the experience of laboratories in providing genetics services is limited to the diagnostic service, and that the clinical decision to start a genetic investigation is usually made by the medical genetics specialist in the referral clinics. nevertheless, these services are important tools for the diagnosis of rare diseases in the general population.
