- Current offers peace of mind - You can micro-meditate 5 times a day during the week. - Customize your comfort - Current can be used during the day or the night - The idea is to inspire you to use Google Chrome more efficiently For years, people have blamed the demise of the summer blockbuster season on the advent of the cheap and convenient home video format. In truth, however, no one has ever cared about the format. It's old news. Why? Because home video, in the form of tape and cable VHS, never came close to achieving enough viewership to make up for the costs of production. But now that the format is in peril, the powers that be are looking into something called High Definition Television. HDTV is an improvement over VHS in that it provides a much higher picture. For example, a typical VHS tape plays for 2 hours on average. But a high definition DVD plays for 5 hours or more. That's a big difference. And there's another difference. With HDTV, the customer is the controller. The powers that be in Hollywood are discovering that consumers are much more likely to watch a movie if it's free with a large audience watching it at the same time. Another advantage of home video is that the movies can be viewed on multiple devices without worrying about cross-platform compatibility. For example, VHS tapes don't play in other devices very well. But HDTV does have a few drawbacks. One is that you need a big screen. Another is that you need a dedicated player. And still another is that the equipment is very expensive. But the one that's likely to be the biggest problem is a lack of content. Dozens of current and future blockbusters are planned for home video, and plenty of TV shows. That's why television executives are now looking into using HDTV to capture the audience. But what do you think about the idea of having a new trend in the movie business? Do you think that HDTV is something that will be adopted by movie producers and consumers? A new wave of wave. The word of the decade. The next big thing is here, and it's called, Wavy. Wave and wavy have been part of the dictionary in the world since the 1800s. It's not that unusual, but Wavy was not the word of the decade until the past decade.

Relax with each new tab you open. Current is an extension for Google Chrome that provides inspirational and relaxing content every time you open a new tab. The content may take the form of tips for achieving mindfulness, but it can also prompt you to an audio-visual clip designed to help you meditate for just a few minutes (something called micro-meditation). After you add Current to your browser, you will be asked how many times a day do you wish to meditate; if, for example, you select 5, then you'll most likely be prompted to micro-meditate five times a day during your working hours. Efficient relaxation techniques Even if you think that guided meditation is a bit cringe-worthy, you'd be surprised to find that the technique can be quite efficient. The exercises consist mainly of breathing techniques, but the voice-over is surprisingly soothing and the ambient soundscapes amplify that effect. The visuals consist of just wavy, slightly trippy patterns, but they can also help induce a state of calm. The extension also records your progress in order to determine you to skip as few sessions as possible. While Current is not an add-on that everyone will need, it probably won't disappoint those who actually need some extra time to just breathe and relax.
