Reason: Added screenshot A: The number of options that the desktop version of Office provides for sending out alerts is somewhat limited. Two of the major options are the Windows task bar and the Program Control Panel's Startup tab. You can use a task bar notification that will only be visible when the desktop is not maximized or when the mouse is not on it, but it's not very useful. You can configure the task bar to notify you when a certain program starts, but it's limited to programs that have an option for this. Outlook has this, for example, but some other programs that I use don't. You can also do this program-by-program. If you're willing to use a third-party tool, there are a couple of options. One is a Java-based app that runs in the system tray and is installed with Outlook 2010. The other is called Outlook Notify. While this application does not run in the system tray, it can be added to the system tray and will then display a separate icon in that tray. However, as its name implies, this tool primarily monitors your Inbox and other message folders. You have to have the tool configured to do so, but it does it automatically. It will not, however, monitor drafts, sent items, or other message folders. You can, however, configure it to automatically send you e-mails when a particular condition is met. Once again, however, I do not believe that this type of notification is available in the versions of Office available for macOS. package wu.seal.jsontokotlin.exception / *Type Exception * * @author jiangyilong * @date 2019/08/05 */ class TypeException : Exception() { override fun getMessage(): String {
