Irisin, a hormone produced in response to exercise, mobilizes fatty acids from white adipocytes in mice. Irisin is an exercise-induced myokine with insulin-sensitizing and antiobesity properties, both of which appear to be primarily mediated through its interaction with the 5'-AMP-activated protein kinase (AMPK) pathway. In the current study, we explored the potential interaction between irisin and metabolic hormones such as leptin and ghrelin. The effects of irisin on the expression of hormone-sensitive lipase (HSL), glucose transporter GLUT4, and retinoid-X receptor (RXR) were investigated. In addition, we explored the impact of irisin on energy storage and mobilization in adipocytes in vivo. Irisin treatment in vitro strongly increased HSL activity, but not the mRNA expression level. Glucose transport in 3T3-L1 cells was also increased by irisin, an effect that was abolished by silencing of AMPK, suggesting that irisin improves insulin signaling. In contrast, irisin failed to stimulate GLUT4 expression, and no changes in the mRNA expression levels of other adipocytic genes such as leptin and ob-Rb were observed in 3T3-L1 adipocytes treated with irisin. Moreover, the change in adiponectin expression and white adipose tissue browning capacity were not observed after irisin treatment. In vivo, irisin treatment reduced the expression of ob-Rb and increased the expression of RXR in epididymal adipose tissue. Moreover, irisin treatment increased the mobilization of fatty acids from epididymal white adipocytes and the serum level of free fatty acids in mice. These data suggest that irisin 04aeff104c
