What's New In?

Rip a DVD to multiple formatsTime is Money Disgruntled with the fact that they have to spend their time searching for bugs instead of producing code? We might have found a way to get around the issue. We came up with the concept of Time Is Money. Which is a competitive approach for developers to build their application in a cost effective manner. It all started as a chat with one of our developer (James) about the number of bugs he had to fix in a given time. It was clear that it was taking a lot of his time to fix those bugs and a lot of his time was spent on searching for the issues in the code and not producing code. We started brainstorming about a solution to this problem and came up with the idea of Time is money approach. Time Is Money Approach The basic idea of Time Is Money approach is to motivate the developer to be more productive and deliver in time and quality. It is an economic concept which says if you are paid for the amount of work you do in a certain time frame, you will do your work in a better and efficient manner. The approach is based on the fact that developers are motivated by money and are only willing to work hard when there is a financial motive behind the work. The initiative is about reengineering the existing code to make it more efficient and to make sure the issues are fixed as early as possible. Instead of fixing the code before it is to be delivered to production, the developers need to find the issues in the code as early as possible. This is done by trying to reproduce the conditions of the issue in the test environment. This is done by setting up test automation that will run on the production environment and will attempt to reproduce the issues and confirm if they were fixed. The Time is Money approach can be implemented by any organization. Even if it is a small team of developers, it could be a big company with tens of thousands of developers. The initiative of Time is Money approach is to ensure that the developers are focused on producing code instead of finding the issues in the code. The approach should be taken in the following way: Set up the framework which is necessary for producing the software Provide a baseline scenario of testing which will take approximately 1 hour Create a test automation strategy which will take approximately 2 hours The following are the advantages of Time is Money approach: The developers will find the issues in the code before they are delivered to production The time is money approach ensures that the number of bugs is reduced by prioritizing it The application will be delivered on time, ensuring a smoother transition The cost and time is saved by not hiring new developers It will motivate the developers to create the most efficient application in the shortest time and deliver it on time and in good quality As a result of implementing the Time is Money approach, the
