The new version is also compatible with Windows 7.April 18, 2016 Bertrand Barret, 'Green MP' of France stands a chance Bertrand Barret, one of the first to stand as a "Green MP" in French politics, has made significant gains in the Paris regional elections, with a strong showing for "ÉcoLibre" ("Green Party") and other green candidates in the Île-de-France. At the end of the first round of the Paris regional elections on Sunday, a "Green surge" had overtaken the previous, larger Green Party in terms of overall vote and its share of the vote. In the fourth round, held on April 22, Barret and his party could pull ahead, with the far-right National Front party closing in fast behind "Les Républicains" ("The Republicans", the party of outgoing President François Hollande) and the Socialist Party. It was a remarkable feat for ÉcoLibre (The Green Party) and its leader Bertrand Barret, a fresh face, born in Africa, who stood against the right-wing, Christian Democrat ("UMP") party in the 2008 French presidential election. After a period in government, with François Hollande in power, he stood again in 2012, and had also been considered for the election to the European Parliament that was held on May 22. For a number of reasons, he did not get the nod for that race. Instead, he decided to stand in the Paris region elections. Those elections were marked by the front-runner, a right-wing nationalist, Marine Le Pen, son of "founder" of the National Front Jean-Marie Le Pen. This year, she received 23 percent of the vote, compared to 21 percent for Emmanuel Macron, the political "godson" of President François Hollande. "The French want to
