The profile of the complex protein expression by plasmablasts and plasma cells in the lymphoid organs of patients with Hodgkin's disease (HD), non-Hodgkin's lymphoma (NHL), multiple myeloma (MM), and other haematological malignancies was studied by two-dimensional gel electrophoresis. The protein expression was compared with the expression in plasma cells (PC) of healthy donors. The expressed protein sets were analysed by image analysis, which yielded maps of the frequency of spots and their concentration. The protein expression profiles of plasmablasts and PCs of patients with HD, NHL, and MM were similar. By contrast, the expression in plasmablasts and PCs of MM patients differed from that of normal PCs and plasmablasts, providing a basis for the identification of MM plasmablasts and plasma cells. From the protein expression profiles, the activation of B cells to plasmablasts can be distinguished from the differentiation of plasmablasts to PCs, as the levels of expression of a few proteins with different expression patterns can identify these two stages. In the lymphoid organs of MM patients, the protein profiles of B cells and PCs are also strikingly similar, suggesting that the abnormalities of myeloma cells occur before B cell differentiation. Finally, the expression profile of plasmablasts and PCs of patients with HD can be distinguished from that of normal cells by the loss of a cell surface protein and the appearance of a new protein. These differences provide a basis for the identification of PCs and plasmablasts in the lymphoid organs of patients with HD. There are many
