aid, a microphone collects an audio signal and a servo module then amplifies the audio signal to a value equivalent to a measure of the power in the audio signal; this signal is compared with a reference value. If the value of the signal is greater than the reference value, it is considered that a threshold has been crossed and a user detection is initiated. The reference signal is stored in the hearing aid in a non-volatile memory in order to retain a setting value that was already made by a user at a previous time. If the same threshold value or similar is stored in the hearing aid, this value is compared with the reference value stored in the non-volatile memory. This system gives the advantage of a simple electronic circuit structure. The detection of the presence of a user is done continuously, since a signal that there is a user is detected at the time when the threshold is crossed. This continuous detection is preferable for the hearing aid since when the user is removed from the detection range, a hearing aid with a battery recharge process cannot be started. The detection is also done continuously in a battery charger adapted to recharge a battery, since the user is detected continuously from the time when the recharge starts. A setting that is done by a user may be stored in a programmable memory
