Thankfully, there are no severe bugs in Lightroom 5. Apart from some performance issues, which will be remedied in an upcoming update, I am fairly happy with how Lightroom 5 is. I probably won't buy the iPad Pro simply because it is much more expensive than the Surface Pro devices. Nevertheless, I would happily consider the iPad Pro if Lightroom offered a cloud capability. I hope Adobe Photo Booth will expand iPhoto functionalities so that users can easily turn their photos into cutout images. Indeed, an interesting idea would be to have live cutout pinning functionality within iPhoto, so that you can add iPhoto and Photoshop images to a shared Pinterest account or Facebook timeline, or even Evernote, in real time. Overall, I'm hoping that Adobe Photo Stream will expand to allow for live sharing of streamlined images via Photoshop. At the very least, I think Photoshop Lightroom should have a delegate capability to iPhoto, to allow me to see what's going on in my shared albums. But it's still a wonderful feature, regardless. The live web version of the new features in Photoshop, which have been heavily redesigned in the software's latest release, feel a lot better than the tiled web previews in Photoshop CC. I like the more traditional user interface, which lets you zoom and pan around your image as you work. It also feels like it's more robust, as some of the glitches I came across weeks ago disappeared. To start off, I'm a little confused as to what the new Adobe Photoshop Elements is. There appears to be two products in the release: a freemium-type app for digital photography enthusiasts and a $2.99 standalone "design" app for the digital scrapbook business. I'm a fan of Elements, so I've always preferred the Elements flavor of the program. But is this the detriment of the lackluster update? Both of the Elements apps have the same interface, and the features remain the same.
