(Baca juga dilihat di ebook Kindle).Q: what is the difference between extern "C" and extern "C++" in C++? I know that extern "C" is used for a C compiler to compile C code, and extern "C++" is for C++. Is there any difference between extern "C" and extern "C++" other than the fact that the latter is allowed to be used with a C++ compiler? What is the main reason for using these two (as it looks to me like they are the same) different declarations? A: There is no real difference as far as the C or C++ compiler is concerned. You can use both interchangeably. That being said, if you are expecting a C++ compiler to understand C, and vice versa, then you have the wrong expectation of the meaning of extern 'C' and extern 'C++'. This is true even though both are interchanged with the C and C++ compilers respectively. These macros are simply the way to tell the C++ compiler that you are not going to be using the C++ features you expect from that compiler. That is, you are not going to be using the C++ class interface in your code. Likewise, you will not be using native C++ overloading. A good example would be: // A simple C++ program with two files: // main.cpp // C++ only // main.cxx // C++ only // test.h // C only // test.c // C only main.h extern "C" { #include #include #include "test.h" } main.cpp #include "main.h" #include "test.h" int main(int argc, char *argv[]) { // The C++ compiler is going to complain if it cannot find a class // defined in test.h because we are
