STORM.Comparative immunological cross-reactivity between human and mouse IgA in serum and mucus of lacrimal glands. Human IgA-specific serum and secretory immune response to a house dust mite allergen (Dermatophagoides pteronyssinus) in patients with a high degree of sensitivity to house dust mites was compared to the response of normal and allergen-primed normal mice using a quantitative ELISA. The serum IgA-specific response of patients with a high degree of sensitivity to house dust mites was found to be significantly elevated in comparison to normal and allergen-primed normal mice. Secretory IgA was isolated from the lacrimal gland (LG) and parotid glands (PG) of normal and allergen-primed mice and compared to IgA in serum and secretions of the human lacrimal glands. IgA specific for house dust mite was not observed in the LG of normal and allergen-primed mice. The concentration of IgA in LG of normal mice was significantly elevated in comparison to normal and allergen-primed LG. The concentration of IgA specific for house dust mite in LG of normal and allergen-primed mice was significantly lower than in serum and secretions of human LG. The findings in this study are evidence that the immunological cross-reactivity observed with human and mouse IgA does not occur in the LG. Therefore, house dust mite-specific IgA and immune response should be studied in conjunctival and bronchial secretions which are the sites of house dust mite-specific allergic sensitization.Feature: Okno Tačno 1.
